1 Enigma I (One) is the Heeres Enigma with plugboard. The first models had the internal manufacturing code Ch. 11 a, while the later, modified models was designated Ch. 11 f. Ch. 11 g was the internal code for the Naval Enigma models. From 1941 and onwards the Heeres Enigma was instead called 24 b 656 after the new engineering drawing designation.

2 The printing Enigma H was the new 1929 model and the last produced of the large printing Enigma machines. The German Army (Reichswehr) called this model Enigma II. As far as we know only 14 Enigma H were delivered to the German Army where they saw service until almost the end of the Second World War. Argentina, Hungary, and the Deutsche Stickstoff-Syndikat (later I.G. Farben) were the only other known users of this machine, which internally was described as Ch. 14. The version delivered to the German Army had a connection that coupled it to the Enigma I, the plugboard Enigma, such that the printing Enigma could be used as printer for the small Enigma I. However, the two machines could not be used to communicate together; they were cryptographically different. In May 1941 the machine H 206 together with its connected Enigma I, A 932, was in for service at the factory of Konski & Krüger. After repairing it should be returned to the OKH radio station (Funkstelle des OKH). 3 The commercial Enigma was generally described as A27, A-series machine model 1927, to distinguish it from the earlier commercial models such as Enigma C and Enigma D, also called A26. Internally this machine was called Ch. 11 b. In 1936 the commercial machine was renamed Enigma K. Enigma K is the same machine as Enigma A27, with some small production changes. The reason for renaming Enigma A27 to Enigma K is most like due to the confusion it created of having both the Heeres Enigma and the commercial machine A27 sharing serial numbers in the same A-series. From the serial number alone, it is not possible to tell if a machine is of the commercial type or of the military type with plugboard. 4 Enigma G, also called the Zählwerksmaschine or Enigma mit Zählwerk, is a commercial machine without a plugboard. It was usually described as G31 or Ch. 15 a to distinguish it from the earlier model Enigma G, Ch. 15, which was a further development of the original Zählwerksmaschine A28 from 1928. The Enigma G31 is often known by its nickname "Abwehr Enigma" due to the fact that the German military intelligence service Abwehr used a great many of these machines. How many of the early Enigma G that was made is not known but a G14 is known to have existed. The G31 machines started their serial numbers with G 201, which was sold to Hungary.

5 Enigma T, or Tirpitz, was a special version of the Enigma K made for the Japanese Navy and that was meant to be used to encipher the communications on the Japanese-German communication plan or agreement code named TIRPITZ. A total of 400 machines were ordered. On 18 August 1942 the Japanese naval attaché in Berlin signed an agreement with Heimsoeth & Rinke (H&R) for delivery of 51 Enigma T machine (T 1-T 51) together with 51 sets of extra rotors IV – VIII for a total sum of 53,550 Reichsmark. On 19 September 1942 H&R received a letter from the office of the Japanese Navy in Berlin where they asked for delivery time for a new order for another 350 machines.
